One sunny afternoon, a group of monkeys and Kalulu spent many hours in a field feasting on the farmer’s groundnuts. The next day, Kalulu heard that the farmer was complaining to others in their village that his groundnuts were being stolen. Kalulu went to him and declared, “I will catch the thieves for you.”

Kalulu went back to the monkeys and told them to bury their tails in the ground. The monkeys wondered, “Kalulu, why are you not burying your tail?” Kalulu replied, “My tail is very short.” The monkeys were satisfied with Kalulu’s answer, and so they buried their tails.

Kalulu watched carefully and when he saw the owner of the garden approach, he quickly ran away. When the monkeys saw the farmer, they too tried to escape, but their tails were stuck in the ground, and the farmer killed all of them.
In one village there was a very, very small bird, named Titi and a very, very large lion.

Now Lion, being very, very large and brave, could kill most other animals. But he would only eat until he was full, and then he would abandon them. Titi would come along then and clean up lion’s leftovers.

One morning, as Lion slept in the shade of a large mango tree, other animals passed by and found Titi eating the remains of an animal who was killed by Lion. When the other animals asked Titi how he came by such luck….Titi boasted, “I killed this animal!” News traveled very quickly among all of the animals about a very brave, yet very small bird, named Titi, who killed an animal many times his own size.

When Lion heard of these stories, he grew very angry at Titi for taking credit for his hard work! After Lion had killed his next animal, he hid behind a tree to wait for Titi. Soon Titi came along and started to eat the leftovers again. Suddenly, Lion jumped out from behind the tree and ate Titi in one bite. But this time – he did not leave any leftovers!
Kalulu and Squirrel often went hunting together. Kalulu had a resounding voice, but Squirrel's voice was very low. Each time Squirrel killed an animal, he would whisper, "I have killed." When Kalulu killed an animal, he would shout, "I have killed!" All of the animals were happy when they heard Kalulu's loud voice because they knew he had killed an animal.

One day, Squirrel killed a person instead of an animal and whispered, "I have killed." At about the same time Kalulu killed an animal. So Kalulu hollered, "I have killed!" Hearing this, the other animals came and found that a person had been killed. They were very angry! When Kalulu saw the crowd of animals coming toward him, he said, "Squirrel has Killed the person, not me." But nobody believed him because they had not heard Squirrel. So in the end, Kalulu paid for Squirrel's deed with his life.
One day, old Chameleon was told to go to the people in the villages and tell them that when a person dies, he will remain dead. Blue Lizard, on the other hand, was also told to carry a message to the people in the villages. However, he was given a different message than Chameleon. He was to tell the people that a dead person is not dead forever.

Lizard, being the younger and faster of the two, delivered his message to the people very quickly. Some time later, Chameleon, who was very slow, tried to deliver his message, but wherever he spoke, village after village, the people replied, “We have already heard the true message from Blue Lizard, that a dead person is not dead forever. So we do not believe you.”

And thus it came to be that the first message is always the more important.
Hyena and Kalulu were good friends. They lived together in the bush. Unfortunately, they had very little food. They discussed this issue and concluded that, "in town, there must be food." So, Kalulu made a plan. While traveling to town, Kalulu lay down on the road pretending to be dead. When a driver found him and thought that he was dead, he loaded dead Kalulu into his car. Inside the car, Kalulu found some bread, sugar, and mangos. When Kalulu woke up, he took the food and escaped from the car. Hyena and Kalulu happily shared the food that night.

Now the next night, it was Hyena’s turn to sleep on the road pretending to be dead. But Hyena was a coward, and just as a car approached, she cried out, “Huwi, huwi!” and ran away into the darkness of night.

Kalulu was very angry and scolded Hyena. He said, "Next time, do not run away when the car comes." Once again Hyena was sent to sleep on the road pretending to be dead. The next car that came along the road was traveling very fast, too fast to avoid hitting poor Hyena... she died, of course!
One day, Kalulu and a group of hungry monkeys sneaked into Mr. Tembo’s garden to steal his groundnuts. They were the most delicious groundnuts they had ever eaten! Kalulu decided that he wanted the groundnuts all for himself. So, Kalulu reported to Mr. Tembo that many monkeys were in his garden stealing his groundnuts. Kalulu said, “Let me tell you how you can kill the monkeys.” He advised Mr. Tembo to lie down in his garden the following day and pretend to be dead.

The next day, Kalulu returned to the garden himself to eat more groundnuts with the monkeys. While they were eating, they discovered Mr. Tembo, supposedly dead, with ants all over his body. Kalulu and the monkeys carried the “dead body” to Mr. Tembo’s house, singing:

“Tembo is dead.
Tembo is dead.
Tembo is dead.”

Then Kalulu told the monkeys to close all of the doors and windows. While they were doing this, Kalulu slipped out of Mr. Tembo’s house very quietly, leaving the monkeys behind. After Kalulu shut the door behind him, Mr. Tembo woke up, and killed all of the monkeys. Kalulu survived, but Mr. Tembo was surprised to learn that, even with the monkeys gone, his groundnuts were still being stolen!
There once was a very poor man who was lame and lonely. He asked several women to marry him. Sadly, many women said “No” to his proposal because he was lame. But, at last, one lady took pity on him and accepted him as her husband. After their marriage ceremony, he took his bride to his house. To her great surprise, she found the most beautiful home she could ever imagined!

The others who had refused the lame man were upset when they realized that they had missed a great opportunity.
Fish often visited his friend, Monkey, up in Monkey’s tree. Yet, Monkey never visited Fish because of his fear of water. One day, Fish asked Monkey, “Can you visit me, please?” Monkey was embarrassed to admit that he was afraid of water and therefore never visited Fish. Fish had a plan. He offered to carry Monkey on his back as they were in the water. So off they went.

Fish carried Monkey on his back in the water, and Monkey was no longer afraid. But, when they reached the deep water, Fish said, “My mother is very sick, and I have been told to collect your heart for her.” Monkey thought hard when he heard this, and not wanting to lose his heart, he said, “I am so sorry, my friend, but I left my heart in my tree. Let’s go back and get it.”

Hearing this, Fish believed him and agreed to follow Monkey back to his tree to get his heart for his sick mother. When the two reached the bottom of the tree, Monkey laughed and said, “You are really stupid! I have tricked you. I need my heart in my body as much as you need yours.”
Once a man and a woman had twin girls, whom they named Ngoza and Lyombo. One day, Ngoza and Lyombo were told to draw water from the well, one with a gourd, and the other with a tin. But Lyombo was a very careless child, and she broke the gourd along the way. She was so afraid of being beaten by her father that she ran away into the hills to hide. The mother, missing Lyombo, secretly followed her to bring her food. Each time the mother visited, she sang:

"Lyombo, Lyombo, where are you?"
"Lyombo, Lyombo, where are you?"
"Lyombo, Lyombo, where are you?"

Lyombo would answer her singing:

"Mother, I am here."
"Mother, I am here."
"Mother, I am here."

After some time, the father suspected that his wife was feeding Lyombo, and he secretly followed his wife to see with his own eyes what was happening. When he discovered that his wife was feeding Lyombo, he became very angry and killed Lyombo.
Kalulu had a car, which he used for stealing bananas and chickens. One day, he was stealing with Hyena. Upon returning home, the two of them cooked the stolen bananas and chickens. When the meal was ready, Kalulu said, “Oh….I am very sick. Hyena, can you get me some medicine?” While Hyena was fetching the medicine, Kalulu finished the meal all by himself. When Hyena came home, he saw that all of the delicious food was gone. After that day, Kalulu tried this scheme several more times.

After some time, though, Kalulu decided to try something different. He removed his skin before he ate the bananas and chickens they had stolen. When Hyena came home from the doctor this time, she saw a red animal, who was really Kalulu, and became so frightened that she ran away.

Several days passed before Hyena started to wonder why the red animal appeared only when she and Kalulu cooked their meals. She was very curious, and when Kalulu sent her for medicine the next time, Hyena hid behind a mango tree to observe what would happen next. She saw that, after Kalulu thought she was gone, he peeled off his skin, left it to soak in water, and then ate all of the bananas and chickens. After his meal, he put on his skin again, and as he was well nourished, he went home to rest in the shade of a large baobab tree.

The very next day, as Kalulu sat eating his meal, Hyena went to the water, took out the skin Kalulu had placed there, and hid it in the sand.

When Kalulu found his skin, it was totally dried up … and Kalulu died!
There was a clay child by the name of Meganyeza. Meganyeza was always told that he should come home quickly whenever dark rain clouds formed in the sky. His clay mother warned him saying, “Child, do not let rain fall on your body. Your body will melt!”

One day, the clay child went very, very far away from home to play. After a time, rain clouds began to darken the sky, but by the time he saw them, it was too late. The rain washed over his body before he could reach his home, and he melted away.

This saddened his mother very much. It is said that the mother can still be heard singing through her tears….

“The rain is coming.
The rain is coming.
I am your mother calling.
I am your mother calling.
Please return to me!”
Hippo lived in the cool, dark water, and Elephant lived in the dry, sunny hills. One day, Kalulu went to Elephant and asked him, “Elephant, who is the Elder, you or Hippo?” Elephant replied, “I am the Elder.” Then Kalulu asked Hippo, “Who is the Elder, you or Elephant?” As expected, Hippo replied, “I am the Elder.” Kalulu thought of a plan to find out who really was the Elder.

Taking a long rope, Kalulu tied one end of the rope to Elephant and the other to Hippo, who was in the water. Kalulu stood in the middle between Elephant and Hippo, and he whistled to start the contest. Both animals tugged, and tugged, and tugged! Elephant pulled so hard that he pulled Hippo completely out of the water! From then on, it was known by all of the other animals in the land that Elephant was truly the Elder!
One day, Kalulu found his friend, Hyena, at home, very weak from hunger. Kalulu said to Hyena, "Had I known you were so weak from hunger, my friend, I would have carried some food to you. I know about a room that is full of food!" The room that Kalulu spoke of was a storage room for Lions' meat. Kalulu and Hyena decided to look for food in this room. Kalulu taught Hyena a magic song that would open the door to Lions' storage room:

"My door, open, open."

When the door opened, Kalulu and Hyena helped themselves to all of the meat they had ever wanted. The very next day, Hyena went to the storage room by herself. Upon her arrival, Hyena used the magic song Kalulu had taught her:

"My door, open, open."

And, once again, the door opened, then closed behind her. Hyena helped herself to all of the meat she could eat. Hyena, ready to leave the storage area, having forgotten the magic words, sang:

"My door, shut, shut."

Nothing happened! Hyena was trapped inside! Later that day, Mr. and Mrs. Lion came by unexpectedly. Hyena, in an attempt to save her life, hid under the meat and was well hidden….except for her tail! When Mrs. Lion noticed the tail, she said, "This is strange! Look! Our meat has grown a tail!" When Hyena heard this, she quickly dug a hole to gather dust. As Mrs. Lion was trying to pull Hyena’s tail, Hyena jumped up and threw dust in the lion’s eyes. During all of the confusion, Hyena was able to escape through the open door.
Kalulu and Monkey were good friends, or so Monkey thought. One day, they were stealing groundnuts from somebody’s garden. When the owner discovered that his groundnuts were being stolen, he complained to Kalulu. Kalulu said, “Don’t worry. I will catch this thief for you, my friend.”

So, planning to trap his friend, Kalulu made a scarecrow in the farmer’s garden and pasted it with a sticky gum tree sap. He then went to Monkey and told him, “There, in the garden, is somebody who is very rude! He does not answer when I speak to him.”

Monkey and Kalulu then visited the garden together. When Monkey greeted the scarecrow, it did not answer. Monkey once again spoke to the scarecrow, and again it did not answer. Monkey became angry with scarecrow’s rudeness and hit him. When he did this, his hands, legs, head – his whole body stuck to the scarecrow!

Kalulu ran to the owner of the groundnut field and told him,

“I caught the thief! I caught the thief!”

Upon seeing that the thief was Monkey, the owner killed him.
One year, there was a terrible shortage of water in the village. All of the animals decided to dig a well, but as he was lazy, Kalulu refused to help. So, when water was found, the animals excluded Kalulu from getting water. Fearing that Kalulu would try to sneak in to steal their water, they hired Elephant to watch the well.

One day, Kalulu came to the well with a pot of honey. He asked Elephant, “Will you try my honey?” Elephant tasted it and, in return, allowed Kalulu to draw water from the well. Other animals were hired as watchmen, and each in turn was offered honey by Kalulu. And, as before, each of them relented and let Kalulu draw water from the well.

Only Tortoise was more clever than the others. One day, when Tortoise was under the water inside the well, she could see Kalulu, but Kalulu could not see her. When Kalulu, seeing no watchman nearby, boldly stole water from the well, Tortoise grabbed him. Hearing of this, the other animals were angry and came to the well to kill Kalulu.

Kalulu bargained with them by pleading, “Please, hit me on sand, not on rock.” Seeing no problem with this, the animals agreed. Elephant hit Kalulu with a mighty thrust of his tusk. But, as Kalulu was hit on sand, and sand was softer than rock, Kalulu was able to escape death.
There once lived a family with too many children. Finally, whenever a child was born, the husband would use witchcraft to kill the newborn child. When the wife gave birth to twins, she feared her husband would kill these children too. She went to the bees to ask for their help. The bees said, “Don’t worry, bring your children to us.” The thankful mother entrusted her children to the bees. Returning often to breastfeed the children, the mother would sing a song:

“Na’nga’ (crying of babies)
The hole (where the bees are living) is crying.”

“Na’nga’ (crying of babies)
The hole (where the bees are living) is crying.”

One day, the husband began to wonder about the disappearance of his children. He asked his wife about their whereabouts. The woman, fearing that he would kill the children at the first chance, said, “This is none of your business.”

So, the very next day, the husband secretly followed his wife to the hive of the bees. After the wife had fed her babies and left the hive, her husband remained behind and sang his wife’s song. The bees, hearing this, were surprised that the voice of the woman had changed to a man’s voice. They swarmed out of their hive, attacked the unsuspecting husband, and killed him. Thereafter, the mother lived a long and happy life with her children.
Five young girls were chatting under the shade of a baobab tree one sunny morning when a lame man walked past them on his way to the village. One girl, who was very unkind, could not help but laugh at him.

Some time later, the girls went to collect mushrooms deep in the dark forest. Suddenly it began to rain and thunder. Again, they took shelter under a large baobab tree. When the rain ceased, the girls stepped out from under the tree, one by one, singing:

“The one remaining under the tree will turn into a pillar.”
“The one remaining under the tree will turn into a pillar.”

After this song, only the girl who had laughed at the poor lame man remained, and it was she who turned into a pillar.
There once lived a family with ten children. The parents owed a lot of money to their creditors. Therefore, they decided to protect the money they had by investing it in a summer hut. One day, the parents went on their way to find work. While they were away, the creditors knocked on the door of the summer hut trying to recover their money. The creditors asked, “Can you open? Can you open?”

From inside the house, the children answered, “Who are you? Who are you?” The creditors, demanding to enter, asked, “Where are your parents?” The children replied, “They are looking for weapons to kill you.” Hearing this, the creditors went inside the house through the roof and snatched one of the children.

Upon returning home, the parents found only nine children. The next time the parents were gone, the creditors came back to abduct the rest of the children. This time, when the parents returned home, they found that all of their children were gone. So, the parents traveled to the creditors’ village to give back some of the borrowed money in return for their children. But when the children saw their parents, they refused to return home with them because the creditors had generously fed them. At home only hunger awaited them.

Taking pity on this family, the village headman gave them a good plot of land so that they could grow food for many years to come.
There once was a husband who hated his wife. Finally, one day, he made a plan to kill her. He sent his wife to a deep well in the forest to draw some water. But, as she did not trust her husband and fearful of what her husband might do, the wife refused to go, at first. But her husband was very cruel to her and, eventually, he forced her to go.

When the wife tried to draw water from the deep well, her husband suddenly appeared and pushed her down the well, where she drowned.
There once was a family with many children. Most of the children were very honest. However, one child was a thief. When she was home alone, she would eat the relish (anything but nsima or rice) that was meant for the whole family. When the parents asked the children why the relish (turkey fowl) had disappeared, nobody admitted to eating it. One day, the parents were determined to find out the truth. So they lined up the children, making them sit on the floor with their legs stretched out in front of them to play a game, and asked them to sing the following song:

“Who has eaten that turkey?
Who has eaten that turkey?
We don’t know!
We don’t, know!
We want to find out.
We want to find out.
Who has eaten that turkey?
Who has eaten that turkey?
Maybe, the sun has eaten that turkey.
Maybe the sun has eaten that turkey.”

Counting the legs, the parents stopped after “Maybe the sun has eaten that turkey.” The child’s leg where the parents stopped the counting was eliminated from the game each time. The game was repeated until only one leg remained – the leg of the thief!
Mr. Monkey had no clue what a problem was. People tried to tell him that problems were not good. But still, Mr. Monkey did not understand. Finally, one person offered to teach Monkey all about problems. So one day, he captured a wild, ill-tempered dog, put him in a sack, and walked with Monkey up the hillside.

When they reached the top of the hill, the owner of the dog untied the sack and freed the dog. The growling dog bared his very sharp teeth and chased Mr. Monkey round and round, for a very long time, trying to bite him. It is said that ever since that day, monkeys live in the trees in the hills because they fear dogs and now understand the true meaning of a problem.
Two boys, who were very poor, set out to look for a job one day and met a rich man. This man agreed to give them work. The two boys worked for many years without being paid. Then, one day, they told the man that they wanted to quit their jobs to return home. The man gave one boy a basket of maize, and to the other one he gave a bundle of grass. The boy who received the maize was very happy with his pay because he would always have food on his way home. The boy with the grass, however, had nothing and was very unhappy.

Now when the boy with the maize reached his home, he had eaten everything he had received. Soon after, the boy with the grass came home to his parents. The parents were very upset and scolded him saying, “You have worked all of these years for nothing but grass!”

But when the boy untied his bundle, a wonderful house appeared in its place. His parents were surprised and delighted when they saw this as they believed that their son had been justly rewarded for his patience.
One day, Owl told the other birds that they should conduct a meeting. All of the birds were invited to the meeting, except Bat. He could not attend because the birds did not think that he was a bird.

Some time later, Hummingbird got sick, and the birds were told that Dr. Bat was an African witch doctor. Blackbird went to Dr. Bat’s office to get help for Hummingbird. But an angry Dr. Bat said, “I cannot see this patient … because I am not a bird.”

Next, came Kalulu who pleaded with Dr. Bat to see Hummingbird to make him well again. But, again, Dr. Bat refused. Swallow visited Dr. Bat’s office too. But, still angry, Dr. Bat would not even speak to Swallow.

Finally, Owl, the king of all birds, decided to see Dr. Bat to plead with him to help his friend, Hummingbird. The doctor agreed, at last, to see Hummingbird. But when Dr. Bat saw Owl, he thought to himself, “With such big eyes, this must be the patient.” So he treated Owl as the patient instead of Hummingbird. Hummingbird, still not seen by Dr. Bat, died!
In a small village by the river, there lived a man with two wives who were sisters. Each wife had one child. One day, one of the women died, leaving her child to the other wife. The stepmother was very cruel to her dead sister’s child. One day, she took her stepchild and pushed her under a large rock. For three nights, as the sun slowly came down, the child would sing:

“Father, Father, I am here, under the rock.”

When the child’s father heard the singing, he looked for his child. At last he found her and rescued her from under the rock. Upon their return home, the stepmother, fearing for her life, ran away and never returned.
Once there lived a husband and a wife who had two children, whom they named Tullanganya and Tulamanya. One terrible day, the young mother drowned, leaving her grieving husband and her two young daughters behind.

Some years later, the father met another woman, whom he married. Unfortunately, his second wife hated the man’s two children because she was very jealous of their father’s love for them.

One day, as their father was working in the fields, the second wife dug a very large hole in the ground behind their house. She tricked the daughters by telling them to “hide in this hole, as the heavy rains were coming.” Then she quickly covered the hole, burying the man’s daughters inside. When their father returned to the house and asked about his daughters, the second wife lied and told him that his ungrateful daughters had run away!
A certain man was known by the name “Tall” because he was as tall as a tree. Tall was a poor mouser who married a beautiful woman. Because Tall’s wife was so beautiful, other men chased after her.

Tall often had to leave his young wife at home to work in the field. One day, when Tall returned home, his lovely bride told him that another man had proposed to her while he was away. Tall asked his wife to warn this suitor, should he ever return, by singing the following song:

“Tall, Tall, I have gone with another man.
Tall, Tall, I have gone with another man.

Who is he?
Who is he?

I’ll beat him with my sickle!
I’ll beat him with my sickle!”

Now, when Tall returned home from working in the field that night, he found the suitor hiding in his home. With one look at Tall and the sickle in his hand, the frightened suitor quickly took to his heels!
Long ago, a man lived with his three wives. Together, the man and his wives would work in the field every day. One day, one wife found that she had forgotten her hoe and returned home to get it. While at home, she took a turkey, killed it, cooked it, and, without hesitation, ate it. Then she rejoined her family in the field.

When the fieldwork was completed, the man and his three wives went back home. They cooked nsima and wanted to add turkey relish, but discovered that it was gone! The husband asked his wives who had eaten the turkey relish, but none of them admitted to it. So he took his wives to a deep well and said, “Whoever has eaten the turkey relish will drown.” The wives circled the well singing:

“Who has eaten the turkey?
Who has eaten the turkey!”

The first wife walked around the well without any problem. The second wife did likewise. When it was the third wife’s turn, she still did not admit to eating the turkey relish. So, as she walked around the well, she lost her balance, fell in, and drowned!
As is the custom in northern Malawi, when a woman promises to marry a man, the man gives her a hoe. In a village, as time went on, one wife became very unhappy in her marriage, and she was secretly planning to leave her husband.

In the middle of their garden of millet, they planted a gourd, which grew larger and larger each day. It grew so large that one could climb inside and be hidden from sight. One day, when the husband asked his wife to work in the garden, she said that she was too sick. Instead of working, she hid inside the large gourd in their garden. As she was hiding, she was observed from afar by Songa, a bird, as she composed the following song:

"Husband, you do not understand,
Husband, you do not understand.
Songa, go and tell my family that I have a problem.
Songa, go and tell my family that I have a problem.
My problem is as big as a baobab tree.
Please, dear parents, return my hoe to my husband’s family."

While the woman was singing her sad song, her neighbors heard her and came to dance in the millet field, and while dancing, they destroyed the whole field. A short time later, her husband returned home and discovered the field was trampled and ruined. Upon seeing this, he became so angry that he left his wife for good.
Elephant was the leader of all animals in the forest, and Hippo was the leader of all animals in the water. One morning, Kalulu decided to confuse the two animals. He visited both animals separately to speak with them.

First he asked Elephant, “Who is greater, you or Hippo?” Elephant answered, “I am greater.” Then Kalulu went to Hippo in the water and asked him, “Who is greater, you or Elephant?” Hippo said, “I am greater, of course.”

Kalulu decided to settle this once and for all with a contest between Hippo and Elephant. First, Kalulu tied the leg of Elephant to one end of a strong rope. Then he tied the rope around a tree stump. Finally, he attached Hippo’s leg to the other end of the rope. Kalulu positioned himself in the middle, beside the tree stump, and waited to see what would happen next.

Both Elephant and Hippo tugged and tugged against the rope. But their tugging was in vain because the rope could not move as it was tied around the tree. When Elephant and Hippo finally could tug no more, Kalulu laughed and boasted, “I am the winner of this contest. So, I am the greatest!”
One warm evening, as Snake was slithering along the path, a big rock fell on his neck holding him there so that he could not move. He remained in the path for many days. Then, a young boy happened to walk nearby. When Snake saw him, he pleaded with Boy to remove the rock, and Boy, who was very kind, did this favor, of course.

But, once he was freed, the ungrateful Snake tried to bite the boy. When Boy realized that he might be bitten, he started to cry.

Kalulu, who happened to be nearby, rushed to Boy and asked him, “Why are you crying?” Boy answered, “I helped Snake remove a big rock off his neck, and yet, he wants to bite me.” Kalulu said, “Let me put the rock back on Snake’s neck.” So, Kalulu replaced the large rock on Snake. Then he and Boy ran away and left the snake to solve this problem on his own.
There once lived twin sisters named Ngoza and Kasiwa. They each received proposals of marriage from young men, who were disguised as animals. Ngoza accepted the marriage proposal, but her sister, Kasiwa, declined. When Ngoza was to move in with her husband, she asked her sister not to follow her, but Kasiwa did not listen.

On the way to the husband’s house, the two girls stayed with an old woman. The old woman asked the sisters, “Where are you going?” Ngoza said, “I am on my way to my husband’s house.” The old woman retorted, “These young men are not human beings, but animals!” So, the old woman made a drum and hid the two sisters in it. Taking the girls to their parents’ house, the woman carrying the drum sang:

“Mbitikumbi (sound of the drum), mbitikumbi. Kango’ ma Kakalilanga (sound of the drum), kango’ ma Kakalilanga.”

The men, still disguised as animals, heard the drums and came running to the old woman’s house. They discovered that the old woman, Ngoza, and Kasiwa had already left for their parents’ house. They quickly followed suit. When the parents saw their daughters’ unusual suitors, they were determined to get rid of them. They poured hot water from a drum over the animals, and the suitors died.
Lioness and Cow each had one child. To provide food for their children, Lioness hunted animals while Cow collected grass. One day, there were no animals and no grass for Lioness and Cow. So they traveled farther away looking for food and were gone a very long time. The two children, who were left behind, became very hungry. They said, “Let us fight each other. The one that falls down shall be killed and eaten.”

Lioness’s child fell first. Not wishing to be eaten, the child suggested, “Let’s try again, because the last time we did not proceed properly.” Cow’s child wanted to be fair and agreed that this was a good idea. Once again, they started fighting. Again, Lioness’s child fell down, but this time the child died.

When Cow returned, she found her child alive, but Lioness’s child was dead. They were afraid of what Lioness might do to them, so they ran away from home. Later, Lioness came home with meat. She was very sad to learn that her only child was dead. She quickly pursued Cow and her child.

Meanwhile, Cow and her child reached Cock’s house. Cock asked, “Why are you running?” When Cow answered, “We are afraid of Lioness,” Cock declared, “I am a chief, and I will let nothing happen to you.” Then Cock invited Cow and her child into his house.

After a short while, Lioness arrived at Cock’s house also. When Cock asked, “Who are you looking for, Lioness?” She replied, “I am looking for Cow and her child.” Now, when Cow, who was hiding inside the house, heard this, she began to cry. She called to her child and said, “Let us pray first.” After praying, the two went to Lioness and bravely started fighting with her. Strengthened by divine power, they managed to kill Lioness.
There once was a man who married a woman from a nearby village. Soon they were blessed with a child. But this woman had become very unhappy with her husband. One day, when the husband was not at home, another man came to visit the wife and convinced her to leave her husband and to follow him. As they were leaving, her only child, who was left behind, was singing:

"Mother, can you wait for me?
The pot is broken.
I want to nurse from you.

Mother, can you wait for me?
The pot is broken.
I want to nurse from you."

After singing this song, and having no food or drink for many days, the very young child died.

Upon hearing of his death, the woman was heartbroken and realized, too late, that for the sake of her child, she should have been a faithful wife.
One breezy Spring day, Cockroach visited his new friend, Hen. They chatted together for many hours, and when it was time for Cockroach to go home, Hen accompanied him.

While the two were on their way to Cockroach’s house, Hen became very hungry, and even though they were friends, he decided that cockroach would make a delicious meal. But when Hen tried to attack Cockroach, Cockroach flew up in the air and escaped into the roof of a nearby summer hut. To this day, out of fear of hens, cockroaches still hide in the roofs of summer huts until night falls and come out only when hens are fast asleep.
Kalulu and Cock were friends. One day Kalulu visited Cock’s house to have a chat with him. When Kalulu found Cock’s wife and asked to speak to him, his wife lied and said, “My husband is not here.” But Kalulu saw Cock hiding his head in his wings. So, Kalulu left and went back home.

Some time later, Kalulu visited Cock for a second time. This time the wife told him, “My husband is here, but his head is herding cattle.” Believing this, Kalulu went home and cut off his head. He died... of course!
There once lived a rich king who had only one son. One day, a beast came and kidnapped the king’s son then hid him underwater in a lake. When the king found out about the kidnapping, he called a big meeting and told everyone that his only son had disappeared. He then ordered all of the animals to help him bring back his son, saying, “Anyone who can help me, I will reward with great treasures.”

It was then that a dreamer came forward to speak of a dream he had, where he saw a lake with many beasts surrounding the king’s son. Upon hearing this, the king quickly located someone to drive a boat in search of his son in this lake.

Afraid of the beasts in the dreamer’s dream, the boat driver asked the king to bring a spear shooter to shoot the beasts who may damage his boat and a boat repairer who could mend the boat. “But how would the son be rescued once he was found?” the king wondered aloud. The dreamer suggested that he bring along a professional thief. After all of the preparations were made, the king went on his search with the dreamer, the boat driver, the boat repairer, the spear shooter, and the thief.

Finding the lake, the dreamer pointed to the spot where the king’s son was being held in the deep, dark waters of his dream. As he had predicted in his vision, many beasts attacked the boat causing much damage. The boat repairer worked quickly as the thief went underwater to rescue the king’s son. The spear shooter had to kill the beasts that damaged the boat.

Next came a group of wild beasts on land who pulled the boat onto shore. The boat was once again damaged and was in need of mending. A few days later, after repairs were made, the king and his son returned to the palace, where they all lived happily ever after.
An older man once married a much younger woman. One day, as the man went into the field to work, the woman said that she was sick and she would remain at home. Once alone, she turned into a goat and, as goats do, she created a great mess in the house. After seeing what she had done, she sang the following song:

“People, husbands here marry goats who destroy the property of this house.

When the husband came back from the field and found his house turned upside down, he ran back to the garden and hid there for some time. Many days passed before the wife once again told her husband that she was sick and would remain at home while her husband went into the field to work. Again the wife sang:

“People, husbands here marry goats who destroy the property of this house.

On this day, the husband came home early and found that, once again, his house was turned upside down and was surprised to see that his beautiful young wife had turned into an ugly goat!
Some years ago, two young people were getting married. As family and friends gathered and presented their wedding gifts to the couple, a young man in a car happened to pass by the celebration. He got out of the car and approached the groom to ask if he could drive the beautiful new bride around a little bit in his new car as a wedding gift. The groom, trying to be agreeable, gave his permission.

The lovely bride got into the car with the stranger, and off they went, never to be seen again!
Once there were two women. One woman had an incurable wound on her swollen back. The healthy woman often made fun of her and mocked her. The sick woman was very sad and resented her for this unkindness. So, she took her wound and put it right on the other woman’s back, and, after a short time, the other woman died.

There once was a black woman and a white woman. Hyena wanted to marry the white woman, but Kalulu loved her too. Kalulu was jealous of Hyena and went to the white woman to ask her, “Why do you love Hyena? He is only my worker. I will prove it to you.”

So one day, Kalulu pretended not to feel well and asked Hyena to give him a ride on his back. When they approached the white lady’s house, she noticed Kalulu sitting on Hyena’s back. Kalulu said, “Didn’t I tell you that Hyena is my worker?” Not long thereafter, the white lady changed her mind and decided to marry Kalulu instead.
Kalulu and Elephant married two beautiful sisters. Kalulu married the younger sister named Sinya. Goli, the older sister, married Elephant. There was a tradition in their village that the sons-in-law would work in the gardens of their fathers-in-law. Kalulu and Elephant worked together in the garden. One day, Kalulu noticed that the handle of his hoe was loose. Kalulu wanted to repair the hoe. So, he took it, and, with a mighty swing, he smacked it on Elephant’s tusk, and his tusk fell off. Kalulu quickly took the tusk away and hid it in the ground.

Later that afternoon, after Elephant had gone, Kalulu came back to the garden to dig up the tusk. He gave it to an ivory smith, who made the tusk into seven beautiful rings. Four of the rings Kalulu gave to his wife. To his mother-in-law he offered two rings. Kalulu saved the loveliest ring of all and gave it to Elephant’s young wife.

Later on, when Goli learned that her ring came from her own husband’s tusk, she quickly told Elephant. Upon hearing this, Elephant became very angry with Kalulu. He wanted to take Kalulu to court, but before he could capture him, Kalulu escaped into the hills. From then on, the people made fun of Elephant and laughed at him for being so foolish as to allow Kalulu to use his valued tusk.
One year, there was a terrible famine, and the hungry animals came together for a meeting to discuss the problem. Kalulu was the chairman, and he boasted to the other animals that he had sacks of maize and cassava in the hills. He instructed the animals to wait at the bottom of the hill with their eyes closed, their mouths open, their faces lifted... and soon he would return with the sacks of cassava and maize.

Kalulu went up the hill that very day, but instead of maize and cassava, he gathered heavy rocks and placed them in the sacks. All of the animals did as he instructed and waited patiently for his return.

They waited....and they waited.... and hungrily, they waited until darkness filled the sky and the stars shone. Then Kalulu, the trickster, returned, shook his bags out, but, instead of food, only rocks fell down on the poor animals. The rocks hit the animals so hard that Elephant was killed first, Hippo next, and then, one by one, all of the other animals died. Clever Lion did not trust Kalulu, though. He had kept one eye open and, as he saw the rocks tumbling down the hill, he dodged them and escaped death.

When Lion confronted Kalulu, he said, "Mr. Kalulu, you have killed my friends! I'll take you to court. The judge will decide your fate!"
Kalulu thought quickly and made a bargain with Lion. He asked Lion not to settle this matter in court, where Kalulu would surely be punished severely for his scheme, and said, “Instead, you can hit me as hard as you like!” But after Lion readily agreed, Kalulu added, “Hit me on the soft sand, not on the hard rocks.” Lion, who saw no problem with this, agreed and hit Kalulu as hard as he could.

Of course, Kalulu did not die, but sunk deep into the sand, where he dug a hole, and escaped instead!
Many years ago, there lived in a village a young boy who was suffering from leprosy. Everyone feared him, and nobody in this village wanted to be near him. He was shunned by all. Eventually, his parents made a small hut for the boy to live in to keep him away.

Whenever his mother brought food to the hut, she sang:

"Can you open for me?"

To this the boy would answer,

"You have made a hut for me in the bush!"
"You have made a hut for me in the bush!"

For many months, the boy was very lonely and sad as he had no friends. His mother only visited him to bring food, and even then she would leave as quickly as she could.

One night, the boy heard a noise outside his hut. He was so eager to see if he had a visitor that he forgot to be careful. What he found was a very large lion, who did not fear him, but ate him instead!
Kalulu and Monkey were once good friends. The people in the village, however, did not like Monkey because he was known to be a troublemaker. So, Kalulu promised the villagers that he would kill Monkey.

One morning, while Kalulu and Monkey were taking a walk, he noticed a mango high up in a tree. He asked Monkey, “Can you get that mango for us? You are such an excellent climber, Monkey.” Monkey wanted to show that he was, indeed, an excellent climber, and quickly climbed up the tree.

When he tried to pick the mango, a rotten branch broke below him. He fell from the tree, broke his neck, and he died.
Long ago, huge swarms of biting mosquitoes lived in a certain area. To protect the mosquitoes, the animals in this area had one rule: Those who do not swat any mosquito during the night, will be given a cow.

Kalulu did not like mosquitoes, especially those who would bite him. But he did want a cow. So he thought up a clever plan. He decided that every time he swatted a mosquito, he would tell the other animals a story. As he was hitting the mosquitoes on his body, he would say:

What the other animals did not realize was that, each time Kalulu spoke, he was killing all of the mosquitoes who pestered him. Of course, Kalulu’s scheme worked, and he received the promised cow.
There once was a woman who wanted to get married. One day, as she was moving in the bush and looking for a husband, she came upon a snake instead. Snake asked her, “Can you carry me home on your back?” The woman agreed to this and carried Snake home.

When they reached her home, the woman cooked a meal for Snake. Then Snake asked her, “Can you boil water and pour it on me?” The woman thought this was strange, but did so anyway. She was amazed to see that, after doing this, Snake turned into a beautiful white man. He then took the woman to his mansion, which was filled with luxurious furniture.

A friend of the woman saw the good things that had happened to her and decided that she wanted the same for herself. So, she went out to look for a snake, found one, and asked the snake if she could carry him home on her back. But this snake was so heavy that the woman dropped him. This infuriated the snake! As her punishment, he killed the gullible woman.
Kalulu wanted to settle in the village, but Dog, who did not like Kalulu, was not happy about this. When Kalulu tried to come down from the hills, Dog, who was waiting on the road, chased Kalulu away. Kalulu returned to live in the hills.

To this day, rabbits are found uphill, far away from villages because they still fear dogs.
Once, deep in the bush, there lived two young caterpillars. One lucky caterpillar had parents, but the other poor caterpillar, who was an orphan, had no parents. One warm, sunny day, the parents told their child that, when he saw new green leaves growing on the trees, he would know that the heaviest rains were about to come. He was told, “Dig a hole and, when the rains come, go hide in this hole to be safe.”

The poor little orphan, who had no parents to advise him, heard these instructions from afar. He decided he would dig a hole, too. Soon he noticed new leaves growing on the trees. When the sky turned dark and the air was filled with thunder, the heavy rains began to fall. He hid in the hole, where he stayed safe and dry.

However, the other caterpillar was very lazy and did not do as his parents had advised. He thought to himself, “When the rains come, I will just hide in the hole of my parents.” But, on that day, his parents died. When the heavy rains covered the land, the child had nowhere to go and was washed away, never to be seen again.
Song

Kalulu, dance, a - e, Kalulu, dance, dance, dance in the sand.

Kalulu, boast, a - e, Kalulu, boast, boast, boast in the sand.

Kalulu, jump, a - e, Kalulu, jump, jump, jump in the sand.

Kalulu, walk, a - e, Kalulu, walk, walk, walk in the sand.
Riddle

Question: How can you cross the river with millet, Goat and Hyena in only two trips? Be careful whom you take.... because Goat eats the millet.... and Hyena will eat Goat.

Solution: First, take Goat and cross the river; then come back to fetch millet and Hyena.

It is not surprising that many people were involved in the collection of the orally transmitted Malawian stories. Due to the large number of uprooted children in Lusubilo’s childcare centers and orphanage, employees and volunteers of Lusubilo Community-Based Orphan Care Programme, in concert with CRS staff, voiced the idea of launching a project on African storytelling.

The collection is meant to benefit the children deprived of many aspects of their heritage at a very young age like the orphans and vulnerable children in Lusubilo’s Community-Based Child Care Centers, the orphans in the Children’s Village and the children whose caregivers are unable to pass on traditional African Values. The stories of the northern region of Malawi are an invaluable treasure of cultural heritage and most of them exquisitely lend themselves for use in early childhood education programs.

Special thanks go to the following individuals: Fidelis Mgowa, who repeatedly reminded Lusubilo’s staff and volunteers of the importance of the oral storytelling tradition for the orphans and vulnerable children in Karonga and surrounding areas; Vifularo Makanyira Mbane, Nyungwe Catchment Area, who introduced the storytellers to the idea of sharing their stories and recruited a large number of very capable storytellers; Pepe Sichali, who assembled the storytellers in the village courtyards, summer huts and under mango trees and assisted with translation; Field Mwanganya, Mwanganya Catchment Area, who promoted the sharing of oral stories in his catchment area; Anthony Mwanganya, who accompanied the collectors on their village rounds and helped with translation; Steve Munthali and Benedicto Zuze, who prepared the way for the collection of oral stories in the Wiliro Catchment Area; Paul Kathanga, for his tireless volunteer work, not only for the benefit of the story collection but also for the provision of numerous early childhood activities in the Shola Catchment Area; Weand Chipeta, Lusubilo Youth Coordinator, who assisted with the translation of the stories; Onitta Kaunda, Lusubilo Office Manager, who typed and proofread the translations; Lymbani Nyirenda, who was available on short notice – wherever and whenever needed; my dear deceased friend, Rose Nyirenda, who stuck with me from the very first to the last day of the project, encouraged me with her infectious laughter and helped me make sense of the distinctive cultural characteristics expressed in the stories.

Without the following storytellers in Lusubilo’s four catchment areas, the story collection would not have been possible. They deserve a very special thank-you for sharing their talents of oral interpretation.
