‘Occupying’ Education

This special issue of the Right Flier focuses on some of the focal issues that have motivated students at colleges and universities across the country to begin to debate in a very public and demonstrative way many of the financial issues related to higher education in contemporary America.

Some of these issues have, of course, been developing gradually over the last three to four decades. But the Great Recession has certainly exacerbated all of these issues and intensified awareness of these issues not just among students, faculty, staff, and administrators, but also across the news media and among the public at large.

In a very real and immediate sense, how we fund higher education defines higher education, and no one can deny that we are in the midst of major changes that will affect the quality of higher education—and, by extension, the quality of life for many Americans—over the next half-century or more.

In contemporary America, higher education is not only linked inextricably to big business, but it is also itself a big business. As colleges and universities receive less public funding and rely more heavily on tuition, research revenues, and investments, severe economic downturns increasingly affect our institutions very directly.

In March 2012, AAUP is joining in the national effort to highlight the issues—in particular, the issues related to higher education—that the Occupy movement has brought to renewed attention.

The national leadership of AAUP and our university’s chapter leadership agree that we are all in this together—that students, faculty, staff, and administrators no longer have the luxury of pretending that our common interests can somehow be sustained or our ambitions attained by pursuing our separate interests.
We must “Occupy Education”: that is, we must claim ownership over the future of our institutions and insist that we all have voices that are heard in the process of shaping that future.

This issue of our chapter newsletter is a basic, first step in that process. It presents facts, culled from a variety of sources (all documented), that might provide a starting point for subsequent, informed discussion of the issues that concern us.

In addition to being posted electronically on our website and distributed as an electronic attachment and as a paper copy to our regular mailing list, an abbreviated version of this issue is being distributed as an insert in the Guardian to insure its widest possible distribution—and to provoke the broadest possible feedback, especially from our students.

I invite you to send your feedback to me at martinkich@gmail.com. In a future issue of the newsletter, we will try to present and to report on that feedback in some sort of meaningful way.

AAUP-WSU is committed to working with student organizations on campus. We welcome the opportunity to co-sponsor events with those organizations and to join with them in activism that supports a common concerns about specific social, economic, or political issues.

Our chapter is scheduling regular events that may be of interest to—and are free and open to—everyone on campus, as well as in the communities that Wright State University serves. On January 31, we hosted a panel discussion on “Post-Issue 2 Political Realities in Ohio and Beyond.” The panelists included leaders of four of the unions that have seats at Ohio’s Labor Table. On April 25, we will be hosting a lecture by Frank Donoghue, author of The Last Professors: The Corporate University and the Fate of the Humanities.

These events are publicized as widely as possible—on the announcement boards, over the university listserves, and on the chapter website [http://www.wright.edu/administration/aaup/aaup.htm], as well as in some local media. The chapter website also includes links to an archive of back issues of this newsletter and three monthly blogs—Ohio Higher Ed, Ohio Labor, and Ohio Politics. These blogs highlight articles of interest on the topics and provide links to full-text pdf’s of those articles.

We believe that being more fully informed is the first step to being more fully engaged.
