Breakfast

This room comes with breakfast included. It’s the standard breakfast. The one you eat each morning, without care, the way your eyes open, and you find out where you are, whatever your dreams have been telling you. If there are birds chirping, great, or if there are bulldozers moving in on the construction site next door . . . it’s better to eat, to fortify yourself.

Everything can wait till after breakfast. Have you had yours? The way our hands carry water to the saucepan, the way we blindly seek out the coffee, the egg to rest in its shallow bath of water, the way we spill little zeros into a bowl and flood them with the primordial milk of the first breakfast after the long fast of gestation, the way the oranges give up their pulp and the melons split open like the sun—all the days have as their birthright such beginnings, such hope, such lists of tasks to attempt. This day comes with breakfast. Breakfast is included, yes.
Alan in the City

Before I grew up and lived at home I'd walk the streets of my suburb at dawn.
The police questioned me, just for walking!
When I left to hitchhike to college I vowed a) never to stop practicing my French horn, and b) never end up in the suburbs. But despite marriage, a house, children, and a yard with a stream that gurgled each spring, I wanted the city! The mysterious runes in the concrete. The artful spatter of leaves.
Here we are, all together, says the noise.
And always someone is cooking—a landscape for the sighted, for the blind.
And you can ride in the subway tunnels with their intimate, steamy smell, and be young. And all the little stores!— like shabby cubbies of individuality—as if entering any of them would take you into an unforeseen life, as many as there are windows, with shades, and Hopper-like figures staring at the street, as many as there are barbers clipping hair in their gleaming emporiums, or chickens on rotisseries like sweating bodies in tanning salons, or buses like good-natured grandmothers, or nymphs in fountains, or fronds in public gardens, or great monuments like Greek temples containing dental clinics, or views of the river (what city can expect to be loved without a river?) or music students carrying their instruments on their backs, as I once carried mine, or birds on the windowsills, or in the parks, or flying above the pixilated crowds roaring in the brilliantly-lit ballparks, or daffodils growing undisturbed beside the corner church. They're watered daily by an avid gardener, a man who came from the leafy suburbs of Connecticut when he retired, and who'll greet you if you pause to admire his beds someday, when you're out walking.
To Returning

Oh feeling of returning, you're not as exciting as adventure with landscapes as strange as alien planets and startling sounds and waves of dismay and anxiousness.
No, you are like a mother. “Here I am again!” the grateful traveler thinks, “back on these streets.”
And the knife seller has gone out of business but the bakery smells as it should! “Here I am, Mother,” we all say as we step into the same stream. And isn’t the pond the same pond, the same little socket of blue in the sandy, shifting hills?

I enter the pond and I am part of you--- I enter the water that parts and admits me with something of the chill of winter still, and lift my arm (my right arm that glistens with the high June sun) and watch it descend and the pond is round, and I go around . . .

You are with me then most strongly, the feeling of you, which is often so pleasurable, though I suppose it doesn't always have to be.
Won't autumn return, with weeds that choke the pond, and then the skimpy sun and eventually freezing rain?
But just as surely the pond will thaw, returning, to become its living self and the young will dance into the water as if they've been away a hundred years. And the old having walked about while retaining their gills may or may not wade in-- simply thankful to be back here with you.
The High Ground

My son and his girlfriend don’t want a child. They admit they couldn’t afford to raise one. But their friend’s son is her godson, and sometimes when the friend works weekends Dan and his girlfriend take him to the beach.

Kids are cute, they think. Meet them a few times and you start to enjoy them, whether they’re yours or not. But they’re all yours, if you share that belief.

My son and his girlfriend share it. They met attending a school for the learning disabled. There the cooks, the janitors, everyone formed part of the team to help the students. Now both have worked with small children themselves. And when it comes to protecting them they don’t have any special difficulty.

But read the news, if you think others don’t. Pundits repeating that this or that army has successfully “seized the moral high ground.” It’s obvious the planet needs to be helped. Alone, spinning in darkness, orphaned and bereft, and needing some fostering care, perhaps a godparent.

Examples abound, if you look around you. In fact here comes one now, cresting a dune, my son and the little godson with his swim noodle. “What does he call you?” my wife asks my son. “Farmer Dan,” he shrugs. “Or sometimes Uncle.”

And now we watch Dan (who never farmed) descending to the shore slowly, slowly because the child has entrusted him with his hand.
Putting Iron

You'd have laughed, Sam, at how your putting iron came to wander from office to office where I work. I'd find it like a long-necked fowl with a stupid, dense head, hiding in the shadow of the Xerox, or month's later in the men's room, or near the palatial vending machine with its rainbow colors so easily shattered by the putting iron's single-minded sense of purpose.

Remember Carla? She became frightened a client might be armed. "Send in the blue folder," we were taught to say.
But would security really come?
So I brought in your putting iron to keep by my desk. The client seemed innocent, if violent, like a bear. "Take your coat?" said I, trying to sound welcoming.
The client wasn't armed. He wore a rumpled white shirt. Peace in his heart? Peace and complaining, while I prepared the golf stroke that could shatter his forearm.

I never took the club home.
It wandered like a steel emissary of wariness, lost in a world of ringing telephones and houseplants, looking for some battle. A gleaming steel spine of self-protective narrowness.
A tainted club. Lately it's been resting beside the mail cubbies that sniffer dogs sniff for bombs. And I heard they're retiring the A10 tank. These days the germs on airplane armrests might be deadly.

Oh, Sam, I didn't make this world, and I don't play golf. You, a socialist-pacifist, sometimes crossed that ocean of grass under a temperate blue heaven to practice, or maybe play nine holes. You never hated anyone, except war mongers, and to everyone else you extended your smile, and friendly hand.
